Hollerith's electromechanical tabulating machine was the first general-purpose digital computer.

It was invented by Herman Hollerith and manufactured by International Business Machines Corporation. The machine was revolutionary in that it used symbols, rather than machine-readable paper tapes, to record numerical data. It was faster than any other computer then in existence. It was used for calculating results of the 1890 U.S.

census, and was particularly useful for tabulating voting results of the 1924 election. It was also used for analyzing material in a variety of fields, and for many years was the principal means of recording and processing business transactions. It was also used to detect criminal activity and to solve crimes. During World War II it was primarily used to process payrolls and to
