Gluten has become an increasingly popular additive in the past few years, because it gives to bread a chewy texture. You may have noticed in the past two years: breads, rolls, biscuits and other bakery products have had to include more and more gluten to get the desired texture. Anecdotal evidence suggests that the gluten craze has been driven by health claims. Claims to be healthier than regular bread appeared first in the 1980s. Dr. Robert Sall, author of a number of books on gluten sensitivity, and Dr. Joseph Murray, a top gluten-free-product specialist, claim that celiac disease is being diagnosed in increasing numbers of people around the world. Dr. Joe Murray, founder and president of the International Gluten Free Society (recommends people with celiac disease to remove all gluten from their diet and explains in detail why this is so. But the health claims have not been supported by epidemiological research. Dr. Sall wrote in a recent article: "In the last 10 years, no epidemiological studies have been published which suggest a correlation between the incidence of celiac disease and increased consumption of gluten." In fact, any correlation has been in the opposite direction. It has been well known for more than a decade that the incidence of celiac disease is highest in wheat-consuming countries such as North America and northern Europe. Celiac disease is now recognized as a major cause of anemia, growth retardation in children, and other serious diseases. Research at the National Institutes of Health (NIH), published in August, found that celiac disease is the most common food-borne disease in the United States. Gluten is one of the major causal agents of this autoimmune disorder. According to the NIH study, the number of Americans with celiac disease has increased ten-fold in the past decade. The only possible reason for the increasing consumption of gluten in recent years is the growing awareness of celiac disease and the corresponding increase in celiac disease awareness. Another factor may be increased concern about the presence of gluten in animal feed. When this information was made public in the United States, there was a mass withdrawal of animal feed containing gluten. It is also possible that the increase in the sale of gluten-containing foods has in recent years been driven by demand for these products.- [Josh] Three weeks into the Magic Leap 2 Developer experience

Q: How to generate an inequality between natural numbers? I have 3 sets of natural numbers: $A = \{1, 3, 4, 5\}$ $B = \{1, 3\}$ $C = \{1\}$ I want to create an inequality between them, i.e. $\exists x \in A \cap B \cap C$ Thus, the desired result should be true. I have tried with: $x > a = \text{Set}[1, 3, 4, 5]$; $x > b = \text{Set}[1, 3]$; $x > c = \text{Set}[1]$; However, I am not able to create the desired result. My code is: $x > a$
