Effects of sodium nitroprusside on pulmonary function, hemodynamics, and nitrogenous metabolites in newborns. Nitrogenous blood metabolites, pulmonary gas exchange, and cardiopulmonary parameters were assessed in 10 infants born at 28 to 34 weeks gestation. Simultaneous measurements were made after injection of sodium nitroprusside (SNP; 2.5 mg/kg) in seven of these infants (study group). The other group served as a control group, and received 0.9% sodium chloride solution (6 mL/kg) in the same manner (n = 7). Basal values obtained before injection of drug were not different between the two groups. After SNP, oxygen and carbon dioxide tensions were significantly decreased, and blood pH and oxygen saturation did not change from basal values. Cardiac index increased significantly, and mean arterial blood pressure significantly decreased compared with basal values. While total blood nitrogen-nitrogen levels remained within the normal range throughout the study, there was a significant increase in the creatinine clearance rate and a reduction in the blood creatinine concentration after SNP. In conclusion, SNP caused increased cardiac output, and increased the coronary and peripheral perfusion. In addition, SNP induced an increased creatinine clearance rate and a decreased blood creatinine concentration, suggesting a direct vasodilator action of SNP in response to a reduction in the blood creatinine concentration.
