In this tutorial, we'll be going through all the steps to resize an image for web use. We'll also be adding a background, rotating the image 90 degrees clockwise and clipping the top and bottom of the image. 1) Open the image Load the image that you want to edit into the workspace. In this case, we're using the picture of Sting. We'll start with a picture of Sting from somewhere between 2009 and 2010. The photo is approximately 2000 x 1656 pixels. You can find the original image of Sting on the internet and download it with a download manager. 2) Change the size of the image to fit on the screen On the top left of the workspace, click on the symbol that looks like a double arrow with a line over it to drag the edge of the image to fill up most of the screen. Drag the edges so that the image is 300 x 500 pixels. 3) Reset the position of the image Now that the size of the image is right, we can move the picture of Sting to the exact place we want it on the screen. We'll start by clicking on the four-line symbol at the top left of the workspace to resize the workspace. Then we'll drag the image of Sting from the working area back into the position we want it to be on the screen. You can see below where the picture of Sting is positioned on the screen. Now we need to make sure that the image of Sting is the right size and in the right place on the screen. 4) Change the size of the image Now that the picture of Sting is in the right position on the screen 05a79cecff

The Fire tool works like a laser pointer or paintbrush in that it allows you to draw or paint on an image. Breast cancer is a leading cause of death among women. Currently, there is no available screening test or diagnostic assay that has adequate sensitivity to detect most breast cancers prior to clinical manifestation. Even with currently available tools such as mammography and physical examination, it is difficult for physicians to distinguish between benign and malignant breast lesions due to lack of specificity. Further, the accuracy of mammography in women over 50 is decreased due to high density breast tissue. Magnetic resonance imaging has been recently applied for differential diagnosis of breast cancer. However, magnetic resonance imaging is complex, has poor signal-to-noise ratio, and is also expensive. These issues greatly limit the number of patients that can benefit from this imaging technology. The overarching goal of our project is to develop a new technique that is both a magnetic resonance imaging and a contrast agent based on biomaterials for the noninvasive detection and differentiation of benign and malignant breast lesions. Our previous studies have demonstrated that we can successfully develop biomaterials based MRI contrast agents that have the ability to image a variety of malignant solid tumors (30-90% in vivo). We propose to use these contrast agents to image and differentiate benign and malignant breast lesions in a rodent model. We will build on our promising preliminary data to systematically evaluate the sensitivity and specificity of the agents in detecting breast lesions and differentiating between benign and malignant breast lesions. If successful, this proposed research will provide a novel and feasible approach to breast cancer detection and diagnosis. If successful, this approach will enable early diagnosis and differential diagnosis of malignant and benign breast lesions, which may help to prevent mortality caused by delay in treatment.
