Exposure of chicken oocytes to follicular fluid for improving the enucleation rate and subsequent in vitro development of the oocytes. The present study was conducted to investigate the influence of chicken follicular fluid (FF) on the enucleation rate and subsequent in vitro embryo development of fertilized and/or unfertilized chicken oocytes. Chicken FF that was aspirated from medium-sized follicles of a 75-day-old breeder hen was used to cover the egg surface of F1 (Kobb, N = 5), F2 (Kobb, N = 5) or F3 (Kobb, N = 5) chickens in the last 3-4 hours before ovulation. By 10-h of culture following in vitro insemination, 59.0, 52.0, and 69.0% of the oocytes aspirated from the FF-treated Kobb hens were fertilized and/or activated, respectively. On the other hand, only 8.6, 13.9, and 20.0% of the oocytes aspirated from the FF-free hens were fertilized and/or activated, respectively. When fertilized eggs (with or without activated oocytes) were cultured for 48-h, the blastocyst rate was significantly higher in FF-treated than in FF-free hens (Fisher's exact probability test,  $P // //$  Copyright 2011-2012 Kosher Penguin LLC // Created by Adler Perelson on 7/12/11 // Copyright 2012-2013 Kosher Penguin LLC // // Licensed under the Apache License, Version 2.0 (the "License

Olfactory receptor neurons (ORNs) are highly adaptable single neurons that relay odor information to the brain. The long-term goal of this research is to understand how the activity of individual ORNs adapts in response to changes in the characteristics of their odor environment and to develop mathematical models that can predict these adaptive changes. Understanding the mechanisms of olfactory adaptation can help identify why some people are sensitive to or hypersensitive
