The interface of the program is pretty minimalistic. You can add a torrent from a file or from an URL. Once you initiate BitTorrent++, tasks start automatically. So, here you can view the file name, size, transferred size, speed, progress, status, as well as elapsed and remaining time. By accessing the context menu on each torrent, you can cancel or pause it, and move it up or down. Plus, you can view history and a log file when it comes to general information, seeds and downloads (timestamp and message). In the "Preferences" menu, you can set output directories (torrent, incoming, temporary, history) and basic options (e.g. enable to automatically start new downloads, set the maximum number of simultaneous downloads, use background hashing). You can also check the option to "Ask confirmation when exiting BitTorrent++", configure proxy settings, as well as set a password for the tray and enable to automatically lock the tray on minimize. The program uses a moderate amount of system resources and manages to complete a task in a reasonable amount of time. However, there is no help file available. All in all, BitTorrent++ is a very good tool for uploading and downloading data, and we especially recommend it to those users who want a simple and effective torrent client. Johnson filed to vacate the paternity test and to stay his lawsuit so he can marry his 19-year-old pregnant fiance... but the judge denied it. TMZ broke the story... Johnson filed the docs in L.A. County Superior Court on Monday. Johnson is currently engaged to Karena Virginia, who is 5 months pregnant with his 3-year-old daughter. Johnson's lawyer, Scott Leventhal, said his client has denied fatherhood, so he wants to give up his rights to become a dad, and go on with his life. Johnson says in his papers -- filed in his name and Virginia's -- that their relationship started in October 2010, and they had sex on several occasions. Johnson says he and Virginia went to the lab -- where a paternity test was administered -- because she thought he was the biological father. But Johnson says... he was under the impression the test results would be sealed under California law. Johnson adds that Virginia hasn't legally terminated her previous marriage... and he believes that gives him full rights over the child. But the judge said the California law Johnson referenced doesn't apply to paternity claims -- which are common under California law. Leventhal says his client's fiancee is a school teacher and they are happy.
