The F001638 patent application, filed Mar. 7, 2000, discloses an arrangement for spacing particles from each other when they are packed tightly in a container. The packing arrangement comprises a cell including a pair of closely spaced side walls, a bottom wall, a top wall and a channel extending therebetween for receiving particles to be packed, a first mounting rack extending transversely from the top wall, a second mounting rack extending from the top wall, the second mounting rack being generally transverse to the first mounting rack, a first and a second rotary arm mounted in the second mounting rack, the first rotary arm including a first portion and a second portion, the first portion being the larger of the two portions, a first pivot arm including a first end pivotally mounted on the first rotary arm, a second end of the first pivot arm being pivotally mounted on the first portion of the first rotary arm, and a first cone mounted on the first rotary arm, and the second rotary arm including a first end pivotally mounted on the first rotary arm, a second end of the first rotary arm being pivotally mounted on the second portion of the first rotary arm, and a first cone mounted on the first rotary arm. The first pivot arm of the first rotary arm is offset from a line that extends through the pivot axis of the first end of the first rotary arm and through the pivot axis of the first cone. The above arrangement is notable because it discloses the use of at least two first and second rotary arms. Another arrangement for spacing particles from each other is shown in the WO2007/012940 patent application, filed on Aug. 10, 2006. The arrangement includes a packing cell defining at least two spaced-apart arrays of pockets, and a plurality of base surfaces shaped as chains of pockets that are arranged in both arrays and face towards one another. Each base surface comprises a cover piece that is hinged to a base piece with their distal ends. The base be at the bottom of the ocean...” You can’t be down at the bottom of the ocean and not know it. From the new website: Formed more than four and a half billion years ago, the sea lies above us. Beneath the waves is an astonishing amount of life. This is where the backbone of life lies: Protein. This is the essence of all living things. And when it comes to us, we could learn a thing or two from the sea. Our oceans make up 70% of the Earth’s surface. This is a lot of room to live. But where do we live? Off the coast of California, humans have been taking advantage of this beautiful place for many years. They built our first cities in the inland sea. We buried treasures in the sea bed. And we have been able to create an abundance in this saltwater environment: Production of seafood has grown; ecologically, this is not a bad thing.

But what happens when there is too much? Our oceans have become an unlimited natural resource. We have been harvesting them for a long time. The problem with that is that the ocean is complex. It is a storehouse. An organic cycle has been created. People have only just now begun to understand it. They must be at the bottom of the ocean. Because the only ones who understand the real balance of the sea are the ones who have gone there. The ones who have seen what happens when there is too much. This is where we come in. The Ocean Insiders Foundation (OIF) is our way to understand the oceans so that it doesn't become a limited resource. We have provided funding for scientific research, and are currently working on creating partnerships with companies and non-profit organizations. You
