The sooner your genes become less efficient at making vital proteins, the sooner you can expect to get sick and die. About half of the rare genetic diseases have a carrier frequency of less than 1 in 200, and half of those affect children. Dopamine is known to be involved in a variety of functions including the control of motor activities, attention, learning and motivation. It has also been supposed that dopamine is involved in the control of the orienting of attention to a part of the visual field. Recent experiments by Tolman and colleagues demonstrated that a temporary increase of dopamine in the caudate nucleus promotes the orienting to a visual field. Other experiments demonstrated that the visual attention can be controlled by visual stimulation which induces a dopaminergic activation of the caudate. The physiological mechanisms are still unknown. The hypothesis is discussed that the caudate controls the attention of man to specific stimuli of the visual world. An involvement of this specific control, which is complementary to the control of motor activities, is discussed. Stent-assisted coiling as an alternative approach to treating proximal carotid artery occlusion. Carotid artery occlusion in the context of subclavian artery stenosis is an uncommon and frequently symptomatic condition which can occur as a complication of surgery or as an isolated finding. In the absence of contralateral carotid artery occlusion, carotid artery stenting (CAS) is an attractive option. We present the case of a 75-year-old man with isolated left proximal carotid artery occlusion who was treated by percutaneous CAS, followed by carotid artery stenting of the contralateral carotid artery and angioplasty of the subclavian artery stenosis. Angioplasty of the left internal carotid artery with a stent-assisted coiling device was then performed. Coiling and stenting of the contralateral carotid artery was performed 5 months later. The result is angiographically successful and the patient has had a long (4 years) asymptomatic period. CAS may be considered as an alternative approach to treating proximal carotid artery occlusion.
